

EXCERPT

"What was wrong with the old Roxie?"

His words had stuck with her. And his kiss.

It was difficult to forget a kiss like that, especially coming from someone...well, someone like Byron. She'd spent more time than she'd like to admit trying not to think about the kiss—about how sweet it was. She'd forgotten kisses could be so sweet. She'd tried extra hard to forget how his lips had lingered. And how in lingering he'd awakened starbursts inside of her. Small starbursts of eternity.

Roxie frowned deeply. Being touched... It had been so long since she had really been touched. The hollowness in her had turned into a resounding ache, and for a few moments, she'd thought about bringing Byron's mouth back down to hers. For a few moments, she'd craved more than his companionship. She'd craved the contact. The promise of heat that came with it.

But had she wanted it—had she wanted him—for the single reason that heat could erode loneliness? There was trust there. There was affection. For those small starbursts of eternity, there had been longing and the promise of flame. It had been too long since she'd felt the sheer, electrical pulse of new chemistry.

Why did it seem like so long since she'd felt the flame? The passion?
